

ChromaDB is a vector database commonly used in AI applications.

It stores vector embeddings that represent documents or pieces of text. Applications can search these embeddings using semantic similarity.

In a RAG system, ChromaDB can store document embeddings and retrieve relevant chunks for a user's question.

Vector databases are useful when traditional keyword matching is not enough to find semantically related information.